For a consent to be valid, it must be so-called informed.

This means that the service recipient has been adequately informed about the purpose (the background for obtaining consent), the information covered by the consent, to whom the information may be given, further use of the information, and potential consequences of the consent. The consent may be withdrawn at any time. The consent cannot set aside statutory limitations on what can be consented to, e.g. parents' versus children's/adolescents' own capacity to consent (section 22 of the Health Personnel Act).
